

Is this thing on?

Aha! Great!

Let's begin with a lesson;

When talking about pottery,
there are many instances of throwing clay...

Like pulling boat oars:

Wire off a chunk of clay.

Wedge the clay.

Like Michael Scott performing CPR.

Then put down the bat and turn on the wheel.

Here is the first instance of throwing clay.

The next step is to brace your core,

Center the clay.

Then open it up,

This very action of pulling and shaping the clay wall, is called throwing.

Commence the build up to one of the greatest fights of all time:

But this story is about a lesser known way of “throwing clay”...

Two high school boys (Ben and Paul) spent their open period in their school’s ceramics studio.

They were both behind in assignments.

My task was to create a bowl with an attached foot.

A foot is a raised base on the bottom of a piece—

FOLLOW THE RED

— and serves many practical purposes

After completing the foot, I stood up, and so my hand covered with clay was raised over Paul's head.

Fell way down

And plopped on his head

It were as if I was a goose flying south for the winter

That just released an early Christmas gift mid flight.

Of which landed on his head

A Serious Accident

He grasped the closest chunk of clay

And channeled his inner MLB pitcher

The bullet of clay whirled past my head as I was sprinting towards the door.

I knew that he wouldn't throw clay outside the studio, so getting through the door meant an ending.

It was paradise.

Until that meteorite fell on my foot.

Against the glass wall
stood a snow shovel,

Which turned into my shield.

So I began deflecting the shots,

And even found a way to return fire.

That decisive sprint to the ammunition

Triggered the true start of this fight.

CLAY FIGHT

We smothered each other with clay.

Until the teacher caught us.

And gave us a talking to.

We spent the next hour triple mopping the floor and using sponges to clean the walls

The teacher came back to a cleaned studio, smiled, and asked,

I suppose it would make for a good story...
